

remarked it was a lucky hook that he caught the fish on as I told you before. Then Eger came out on the beach after he had had his supper; he had evidently come in on the train which gets in from Philadelphia something in the neighborhood of a little before 7, I think it is, (I cannot tell you the time; we can look that up) and had eaten his supper and come out on the beach. You see I had gone over to let them know that the fish were biting.

Q Did you go over to Eger's house?

A I went over there earlier, before Eger was there, to let him know the fish were biting, for him to come over. Eger never fished unless I got some bait for him, because, having the opportunity to go up to the fish pounds or to go down out in the bay or catch mullet or things like that, I would generally have the bait and I supplied a good many people with bait. So Eger came over and either got bait directly from me or went to my bait box back of the garage and got some, I don't remember, but anyway he fished in the vicinity of me.

Q About how many feet away, do you recall?

A Oh, we generally spread out 25 to 30 feet apart.

Q You never fish in a party or in a group, do you?
